

MR. DULLES:

File: Woodrow Wilson School

The Agency has long considered the possible use of summer internes from the various Schools on International Affairs which have programs similar to that of the Woodrow Wilson School, principally as an aid to recruiting JOT's. Security precludes our offering student internships because of the clearance problem.

Possible considerations:

1. Locating internes with REE activity in New York.
2. Initiating a program through the Office of Training which would select students from various universities for summer training in a "Washington semester". This could be justified on the basis of recruiting these people for the JOT program. The "Washington semester" would, of course, not permit the internes access to classified information.
3. Suggest that Princeton in affiliation with local universities in the city, establish a "Washington semester". The American University already has such a program in operation, with 150 universities throughout the country. Such a program allows graduate students to attend a program in Washington wherein they meet and are briefed by the various departments of the Government in answer to the question of the "who, what, where, when and how of Government operations." (We are attempting to do something of this sort on a relatively minor scale for the new JOT class).

Subjects such as: "Do we have a welfare state?", discussed by a representative from the Health, Education and Welfare Department; "CIA and National Security" (CIA); "Managing America's water resources" (Department of Interior); "the Government-business relationships and the economic war" (Department of Commerce).

You could suggest that there be arranged for those graduate internes who are located in the Washington area working out of Government departments, ~~xxxx~~ a program of briefings by the different departments.
